Description

ANONYMOUS

"Sonnet, on the Inhabitants of LONDON"

In London scarce a bird but may be found:

The sun-eyed eagle borne on lofty wing,
Linnets that adulate the smile of Spring,
And ravens croaking with portentous sound:

Owls wrapt in dulness, crows toward carrion bound, 5
Parrots whose squalling notes incessant ring,
Swallows that dare to chatter near a King,
And gabbling geese nice students wish were drowned:

Mud-haunting ducks that dabble in the street, 10
Fine birds of paradise with little feet,
Peacocks that spread a gaudy-painted fan;
Grain-raking poultry, enemies to flowers,
The stork imperious that all things devours,
A phoenix there would be an honest man.

NOTES:

3 Linnets A type of finch known for its pleasant song with quick trills and tweets; adulate "To flatter in an obsequious or sycophantic manner, to fawn on" (OED).

4 portentous "Ominous, threatening" (OED).

10 birds of paradise A family of birds found throughout the islands of New Guinea which are recognizable by the males' highly elaborate plumage.

13 imperious "Exercising a commanding influence; ruling, sovereign, dominant" (OED).

14 Phoenix A bird in Greek mythology that was characteristically long lived and went through cycles of death and rebirth from its ashes. Also an early symbol of Christianity.
