

John Hawes, "On Seeing an Infant Boy Seven Years of Age learning to write"

Description

JOHN HAWES

On Seeing an Infant Boy of Seven Years of Age learning to write

HIS Infant Fingers, scarce could grasp the Quill
And yet with Ardour, he pursu'd his Skill;
Attention fix'd his Mind, and fill'd his Brain,
His Copy in Perfection to explain;
His Eye pursu'd each Stroke so
superfine, 5
And strove to improve, each Character and Line;
So far before the common Time of Youth.
Did Art appear in Innocence, and Truth;
He forc'd these Lines, to vindicate his Praise,
And in my Mind did these Ideas
raise. 10

But when I found Apollo fir'd his Soul,
To Musick's Charms, and saw his Fingers roll,
I found his Frame with Heavenly Gifts endow'd,
Bove vulgar Mortals, blest by mighty Jove.
He joins the sounding Lyre with Infant
Voice, 15
By Inclination led, and fix'd by Choice;
Points full Perfection, in his Time to come,
If Manhood crowns Him, in Time's fickle Womb.

Thus when Pygmalion strove to carve his Maid,
Each stroke with curious View, his Mind
survey'd; 20
He still pursu'd the chissel, and improv'd
Each Touch Divine, to gain the Art he lov'd.
In Innocence, by his own Skill betray'd,
The Goddess Venus, bless him in his Maid;
Gave Life to Ivory, for his matchless Strife, 25
Made his own Genius to become his Wife.
